Opening Up the History of Garage Doors

For as long as humans have had wheels, they've needed places to park their wheeled vehicles. Carriages and wagons were often stored in sheds, barns, and carriage houses along with horses. The garage door as we know it today was invented by C.G. Johnson back in 1921.

As the automobile increased in affordability and popularity in the early twentieth century, people needed a space to park their car — especially because early car models had no roofs and needed protection from the elements. At first, people utilized barns and other storage areas, but getting in and out was a challenge. Early garage doors swung out, causing them to frequently be blocked by snow or other obstacles. Some opted to park in other spaces such as public parking garages — but then people had to find other modes of transportation to actually get to their car.

Johnson created the first overhead door in 1921, then followed that invention with the first electric door opener in 1926. While many garage doors before then swung out, Johnson's invention meant the door could be pulled upward and folded parallel to the ceiling of the garage. And the electricity made it far easier to open and close.

As the 20th century progressed and more people were buying automobiles, architects began designing homes with garages attached. And, as people's tastes in home design changed, garage door design also evolved.

Today, you can get a garage door in a wide variety of different materials in just about any color you'd like! And the advances in garage door technology would wow C.G. Johnson — like how doors can be opened with the tap of a button on a smartphone, or the push of a few buttons mean packages can be left safely inside the garage. Precision is a leader in the garage door industry with a myriad of designs, colors and top-quality materials that will fit any home and technology to keep your home safe and in great condition.
